The Web savvy will be able to experience California history with a few clicks of the mouse starting today.

The California Museum will launch the first of its "legacy trails" – online versions of a tour through history like Boston's Freedom Trail.

This trail on remarkable women will feature 15 Californians such as Concepción Arguello, Amy Tan, Ray Eames and Dolores Huerta, through photographs, biographies, videos and art, according to a news release from the California Museum.

Find the legacy trail at www.californiamuseum.org.

The idea of learning through an interactive Web site came from Maria Shriver, who has revitalized the museum since her husband, Arnold Schwarzenegger, became the state's governor in 2003.

"The California Legacy Trails provide an incredible tool and a practical way to learn about California, no matter where you are," Shriver said in the release.

Subsequent online trails will teach people about where the state's progressive movements were born, where grapes are grown and where movie stars grew up. An interactive feature will offer a California passport, allowing users to check off iconic locations through their Web travels across the state, as well as e-postcards of California images that users can insert themselves in.
